Dear Peter:

Having worked with you now for about a decade and a half, I can attest to your various and sundry skills and attributes – both professionally, personally (because we have become friends too!) and in your relationships with others.

Let's start with the basics: You are a giver. You seem to operate on the premise that giving first in life should be one's first instinct. Predictably, it comes back to you ten-fold! This is lovely to witness in life. And being in the speaking business for about 30 years now, it is refreshing to see this in a speaker.

As a motivational speaker, Peter, you command the platform, engage your audience immediately and exude confidence and grace.

Grace – now there's a strong attribute, and one we look for when we hire speakers for our clients. People with grace last decades in the business of professional speaking.

Respect for people – people feel it from the platform. Amazing quality, given the healthy ego that is required to be a professional speaker. You have high regard for others.

Peter, you possess the qualities one looks for in a person first and if one combines those with your pithy content, entertaining delivery and timely, uplifting commentary, clients are almost guaranteed to have a winner at their conference.

Warmly,

Carol Brickenden
